Abstracts of Working Papers

“Consequences of Mandated Bank Liquidity Disclosures”

Abstract: This paper examines the capital market consequences of mandatory disclosures of banks' liquidity and the resulting changes in banks' behavior. Employing a hand-collected sample of the disclosures of banks borrowing from the US Federal Reserve Discount Window (DW), I find that these disclosures contain positive incremental market information and decrease banks' cost of capital. However, I also find evidence of endogenous costs associated with more disclosure as banks respond by increasing liquidity holdings and decreasing risky assets. Following the disclosures, affected banks avoid accessing the DW facility, consistent with the presence of the DW stigma.

“Regulation of Compensation and Systemic Risk: Evidence from the UK” (with İrem Tuna)

Abstract: This paper studies the consequences of regulating executive compensation at financial institutions by examining the introduction of the UK Remuneration Code, which aimed to change the decision-making horizon and risk-taking incentives of bank executives. We find that, in line with the intent of the regulation, UK banks contribute incrementally less to systemic risk in the UK and are less sensitive to UK systemic risk relative to other large UK firms after the implementation of the Code. However, UK banks also experience higher unforced CEO turnover when compared to other UK firms. Therefore, while the regulation may have had the desired effect on systemic risk, it may also have given rise to some unintended consequences.

“Financial Intermediation through Financial Disintermediation: Evidence from the ECB Corporate Sector Purchase Programme” (with Aytakin Ertan and Marcel Tuijn)

Abstract: We study the spillover effects of financial disintermediation on the supply of credit to small and medium enterprises (SMEs). We find that direct central bank lending to large corporations induces banks to increase lending to SMEs by 8 to 12 percent. This effect is stronger for liquidity-constrained banks. SMEs with relationship banks affected by disintermediation borrow approximately €77,750 more relative to SMEs in the same country and industry. We verify that these inferences are not due to changing economic fundamentals or selection in central bank financing. Despite documenting positive effects, we also find that they disappear in the long term, casting some doubt on the structural efficacy of financial disintermediation as a tool to enhance bank lending to SMEs.

“Observing Enforcement: Evidence from Banking” (with Rimmy E. Tomy) (previously titled “Regulators’ Disclosure Decisions: Evidence from Bank Enforcement Actions”)

Abstract: We find the public disclosure of regulators’ actions influences their enforcement behavior. Using a change in regulation regime, which required disclosure of bank enforcement actions (EDOs), we find that regulators start issuing more EDOs, intervening sooner, and relying more on publicly observable signals. The content of EDOs also changes, with documents becoming more complex and boilerplate. Our results suggest regulators respond to the increased public scrutiny of their actions. We also assess the impact of disclosure on bank outcomes and find a decline in deposits and an acceleration of bank failure, despite improvements in banks’ capital ratios and asset quality.

“The Impact of Banking Regulation on Financial Reporting: Evidence from the Dodd-Frank Act” (with Li Zhang)

Abstract: We investigate how the Dodd-Frank Act (DFA) affects voluntary disclosures of large bank-holding companies (BHCs) relative to other banks and unregulated firms in the financial sector. Using a difference-in-differences research design, we find that following the introduction of the DFA, large banks become less likely to issue earnings forecasts containing bad news. They also reduce the frequency of issuing earnings forecasts but increase the frequency of providing forecasts for dividends and return on assets. In earnings-related conference calls, managers of large banks offer information with incrementally higher numerical and forward-looking intensity in both the prepared remarks and their answers to analysts’ questions. Finally, we find that large banks provide incrementally less information than other banks about certain regulated activities and instead focus more on commercial banking financial performance and market innovation. Our findings provide the first evidence of the unintended consequences of the DFA on changes in affected banks’ voluntary disclosures, an important component of the information environment.

“Information Verification in FinTech” (with Thomas Bourveau, Randall Hucks and Guoman She)

Abstract: This paper studies the trade-off between full and partial information verification in an unsecured consumer credit market. We use data from Lending Club (LC), one of the largest marketplace lenders. Unlike traditional lenders, LC verifies only a fraction of its credit applications to reduce the cost of adverse selection. We observe that, conditional on borrower characteristics and creditworthiness, the rate of verification decreases with the cost of information disclosure for the borrower. However, we also find that information verification is associated with a decrease in default. In particular, we find that partial verification leads to a decrease in default by 5 to 10%. Our study provides first evidence on the role of information verification and adverse selection in this non-traditional financial intermediation market.
